Many corporations have responded to the advent of global sustainability norms/codes by adopting policies that seek to mitigate and make transparent their environmental and social impacts. It is unclear, however, to what extent corporate social responsibility practices influence corporations’ other political activities, such as lobbying, in ways that are consistent with their stated social obligations. The paper addresses this question by conducting a content analysis of the CSR reports of 100 corporations from three countries (US, UK, Germany) at two points (1997-2000; 2010-2013). This analysis will reveal: (1) the extent to which corporations include lobbying in their definitions of CSR, (2) how integrated corporate lobbying and CSR policies/practices appear (3) the extent to which reporting on lobbying yields information that can empower NGOs/stakeholders. The paper thus sheds light on the extent to which CSR practices warrant accusations of ‘organized hypocrisy’ or potentially affect policy change.